

in science, the species was accurately portrayed in the movie as the dedicated father role that the male fish play: male clownfish are in charge of making the nest and guarding the eggs. Though we can attribute Nemo's erratic swimming to his little fish, clownfish, in general, are not very good swimmers. In reality, clownfish rarely venture out from their anemone. Orange clownfish, specifically, are native to the tropical Pacific region.