

about the topic. I've never really delved into it deeply. But now I have, and I've certainly gained the feeling that we really did thinking about it deeply. As our economy and land changed with the coming and past years, we were not human enough to know, watch, and observe the nature around us. We were only thinking about ourselves. What the land could do for us. How much paper could be made for us with those factories. How we can manipulate those beautiful trees, animals for our needs. But really, were we actually being curious and creative trying to use so much of the land for our own use?

Think about it this way. There were many plants, animals, insects, and fungi, living in the woods that were once lush. They were towering before us. But we cut them down for building houses, and for paper. With time due to the air pollution and climate change burned down forests faster than the animals, insects, and other living things could run. Let's turn it back to the woods. How did air pollution and climate change start? Because of us. We have polluted the air with harmful toxins and chemicals.

But we can change this. We can stop polluting the air, and stop cutting down so many trees, because without filtering trees, we won't breathe any air, because there won't be any, whether it's polluted or not. So, next time you cut down a tree, plant 2 more. It is even better! Just leave the forests the way you left but with more. The trees also are habitats for the animals. The songbird I chose, the Yellow-Throated Warbler, lives in trees in the southern forest such as a pine forest. A forest has a lot of trees, and if we cut it down, we are basically destroying a bird's and many other animal's homes.

With all that said and so forth, you might be wondering why I chose to organize my art like the way it is. I wanted to incorporate the trees of the pine forest in the background and the small creek. It encourages the things of incorporating our forests. And as for the frog, I put the frog perched on a branch to symbolize that the bird is looking out into the forest enjoying its natural beauty in its home. Let's do the right thing together, and save the songbirds as well as many other animals.
