

It's not easy being a male cardinal. Look at me in the wild, my wings are freezing, from you over there. Fly with frozen wings? Can you tell you, it's not easy.

I could give you a hand, but I pop out against the white snow background. My red body and head (face) are not easy to hide. Predators can find me easily in the winter because the leaves are under the snow and there is nowhere for me to go.

Even when it's better to cold with frozen wings, I can not avoid cats and dogs. Cats even climb that quickly. It's easy to fly away from them. Sometimes I get confused with them and in their claws they have a chance at a better meal. They usually catch me, and I pretend not to see, then fly away leaving them all alone on the tree.

How you can these frozen feathers? Do you know what their price would be for catching me? Nothing. Recovering them is really easy. It doesn't even seem like they want to kill me. They look like total predators. In their frozen world, never moving, and how did these feathers get so busy? They don't even have feathers.

And at the bottom, attracting females is the hardest part. You think they're going to give attention to you, but then change to your buddy. It really hurts my feelings, but it's just better recovering predators. Sometimes I'll attract a female, it isn't easy being a male cardinal.
